A National PMC's Reporting Misattributed $40M in Annual Rent Revenue

Client Challenge

A national PMC with 400+ properties studied needed a more accurate view of its marketing performance to guide budget decisions, as they believed they were missing the full picture. They engaged Hyly.AI, an independent measurement partner, to analyze attribution across their portfolio to gain a complete picture of which marketing sources truly drive their leases and revenue.

Key Insight

The client questioned its PMS reporting. Google and property websites were named most often as the lease-driving sources.

But those were typically the last sites renters visited before submitting a lead - not where renters discovered and learned about their communities. As a result, the PMS underreported Apartments.com's influence on leasing performance. By measuring the full renter journey, the client learned that Apartments.com generated 101% more leases at a 50% lower cost per lease than its PMS reported.

What is missed attribution costing your property?

PMS platforms were not built for marketing attribution and typically reward last-touch channels. They often overattribute results to property websites and Google because those may be a renter's final stops before submitting a lead. As the renter journey gets more complex, renters first discover a community on Apartments.com, then search for it by name through another channel. If the renter hadn't found the community on Apartments.com, they never would have signed the lease. That's why Apartments.com delivers more leases at a lower cost per lease than our clients' reporting typically indicates.

> The digital path from a lead to a lease is not linear. Most prospects travel across multiple websites and paid platforms, and if you're not following every step, it's impossible to trust that your system of record is telling the full story. As an independent resource, Hyly prides itself on capturing the entire renter journey in an auditable way to help property management teams correctly attribute their marketing spend to move-ins, so every dollar delivers maximum value."
